What if Clarence and Anita Came to Fuller?

by Ruth Fuglie, Director for the Office of Student Services

The recent furor over alleged sexual harassment that arose in the Thomas confirmation hearings has everyone buzzing about what if that happened wherever they happen to be - like Fuller, for instance. Recipients of unwanted sexual behavior are wondering if it's even worth it to try and report, while others are wondering how great the risk is of being falsely accused, or somehow unknowingly being perpetrators.

For employers and administrators responsible for dealing with sexual harassment in their organizations, the Senate committee hearings were a crash course in how not to deal with a sexual harassment allegation. Since Fuller is in the process of completing the Complaint Resolution Procedures portion of its Sexual Harassment Policy, the alert comes at an appropriate time.

If the Senate committee had utilized procedures similar to those Fuller has drafted, much of the damage might have been contained.

The draft complaint resolution procedures require prompt attention to the allegation, impartial investigation of the complaint, and conformity to confidentiality and privacy requirements. Of course, all of the above are bound to be missing in a highly politicized, nationally televised process conducted by a homogeneous panel untrained in this complex area of human relations. To be sure, the object of the committee hearings was not to resolve a sexual harassment complaint, but to confirm (or prevent the confirmation) of a nominee.

Mediation, one of the key elements of complaint resolution in the Fuller policy, was not even a consideration.

A person experiencing unwanted sexual advances has the option under Fuller's procedures to seek mediation of the complaint rather than file a formal grievance. Legal and corporate studies show that the vast majority of complainants are seeking only to be free from subjection to the unwanted behavior; they are not usually seeking punitive actions. Fuller's complaint resolutions require that if a recipient chooses to file a formal complaint of sexual harassment, he or she must do so within 90 calendar days from the time the complainant knew he or she was being harassed, or thirty working days after mediation has been completed, whichever is later. Time limits are also set for the administration to complete investigation and resolution of the complaint process. Neither the alleged perpetrator nor the alleged recipient is well served by a delayed process. Investigation must be impartial, and there is provision for all parties alleged to be involved in a complaint to have representation present when interviewed during the investigation. Confidentiality is one of the most important elements in the complaint resolution procedure. This is the area where the Seminary is currently working to develop uniform requirements. Just as sexual harassment often takes the form of irresponsible speech, other forms of irresponsible speech such as false accusation, repeating misunderstandings or misinformation, and just plain old sinful gossip can also cause significant psychological, spiritual, and economic harm. Therefore, whenever dealing with complaint resolution, we must be clear about who needs to know what, and who doesn't have any business knowing at all. Please pray for the administration's wisdom as they refine this area of Fuller's procedures.

We live and work in a time when the cost of our society's "isms" (ableism, racism, ageism, and sexism) is becoming apparent in turnover, absenteeism, lost productivity, and court costs. Motivated by self-interest, many organizations are recognizing the practical side of justice and decency and are responding with policies and procedures designed to prevent power abuses in the workplace. The spiritual cost of injustice is even higher, however. The statement in Fuller's Sexual Harassment Policy Preamble emphasizes this and could be applied to any of our society's "isms": "Sexual harassment is a violation of Christ's commandment to love our neighbor as ourselves; it denies the image of God in the other; and it negates our oneness in Christ. Sexual harassment regularly involves the abuse of power; it invariably interferes with shared ministry and renders the body of Christ." These are powerful motivators to avoid sexual harassment, and to prevent its inroads into our environment by all appropriate means.

Talking with Robin Nygaard about women’s concerns, a person becomes aware that maybe we’re talking about something much larger. Something that moves from women’s issues into racial, ethnic and cultural ones, as well as other parts of our great diversity as those created by God in God’s image.

A 1979 graduate of Fuller with an MDiv degree, Robin has been the Director for Women’s Concerns, an arm of the Office of Student Services, for the past two years. But, she’s been involved in women’s issues at Fuller since 1984. Entering Fuller, she felt “clueless” about issues of being a woman. After she was able to articulate the problems a woman faces, pursuing the call to ministry and understanding the problems men have in sharing church leadership with women, she began to get involved in issues involving women at Fuller. Originally interested in pursuing a career as a therapist, Robin realized that her desire to help people realize their value as people would take a different direction. After taking one MFT class, she realized that she is a pastor, not a therapist. “I need to speak the truth, hold people accountable, using the Gospel as a mirror.” She is currently seeking ordination in the Presbyterian Church, USA.

Robin sees herself now as a resource for empowering women at Fuller. She acts as a sounding board and advocate for women students and encourages the visibility of women in leadership roles through lectureships and forums. Many women come to Fuller, she says, in response to a legitimate calling into ministry. Yet, they are confused about many conservative churches’ resistance to women in ministry. Empowering women, to Robin, boils down to articulation, learning the tools of exegesis and biblical interpretation to understand the true intent of the Scriptures to affirm themselves in their calling. “The goal of the Office of Women’s Concerns,” she says, “is to see women graduating with a clearer understanding of where they are headed, having been supported on their journey.”

Robin acts as a bridge between the Administration and students, regularly translating seminary decisions or actions through the eyes of the women. “We need to educate, to sensitize, so that the community can embrace what women can bring to Fuller.” Robin is passionate but hopeful. She hopes that graduates of Fuller, men and women, will have learned an important truth...that the Body of Christ is incomplete without the input of women as well as men in its leadership. She hopes that graduates will leave Fuller, intentional in supporting women through their language, example, and application in their ministry.

Bridge-to-Sobriety

"Husband kills wife after smelling wine on her breath."

The ancient Roman method of stoning women who drank wine is not unlike the inhumane and discriminatory way that many chemically dependent women have been treated in more recent times. More than 4 million women are alcoholics and the numbers continue to grow. While both men and women do unfortunate and irresponsible things while under the influence of alcohol, society has tended to treat women with more contempt and judgement. What might be seen as macho or funny for a man would be seen as cheap and degrading to women. This additional stigma and scorn serves only to drive the behavior underground and fuels the need for secrecy. Clinic’s designed specifically for women’s issues do exist but they are far outnumbered by facilities for men. Gender specific issues must be dealt with for treatment to be effective.

As bringers of the good-news we must be open to, and involved in, the struggles that our sisters and brothers bear. Let’s create a safe environment where people can come forth with their struggles instead of stereotypes and judgements that keep the problems alive. Three excellent and easy to read books are:

- Women and Drugs: Getting hooked, Getting clean, by Lucy and Emmanuel Silvas-Peluso, 1988, Comp. Care Publishers.
- A very practical clergy handbook is entitled Alcohol and Substance Abuse, Stephen P. Athorp, 1983, Morehouse-Barlow.
To become a Pasadena local is sort of like joining a Greek organization at college: you have to do certain things, know a few “secret” facts, and expect to make life-long friends. While there are many outsiders who scoff at the locals, I think this is merely an outward manifestation of their unspoken envy. So, for those of you who want to take the plunge, here’s what I think it takes to begin the quest of becoming a Pasadena local.

First of all, never complain about the city with anyone except other established locals. With other committed Pasadenaans you can lament the west side drivers who have migrated to our city, talk about the SCDAM’s air quality management programs, and share your stories of the worst and best days of air and freeway congestion.

To be a local, you need to have at least one good story about your personal experience with the Rose Parade (working on a float, sleeping on the parade route, selling souvenirs, etc). You also need to know the mother of at least one of the members of the Rose Court. This is easier if you are a high schooler yourself, but don’t lose heart—usually at least one of the girls attends Lake Ave Congregational Church, So a quick scan of the church directory should give you the needed connections. Some firmly entrenched locals are so very local that they don’t even go to the parade anymore and simply watch it on TV because the out-of-town visitors block their driveways (my Pasadena mother has been doing this for years and insists she sees the floats better).

Locals love the City Hall building and libraries, go to events at the Civic Center, and attend the Pasadena Art Alliance Sale (a city mega-garage sale held each spring in an empty warehouse somewhere in town). Locals hang out at Old Town Bakery and request their coffee in the classic BOWLS—“we take no measly mug substitute! Locals have breakfast at Birdie’s and Maison’s, have shot at least one toothpick into the ceiling at Rose City Diner, and savor cinnamon rolls at Pie-N-Burger. Locals know where to find the E-Bar.

Locals appreciate the mountains when they come out. They walk, bike, skate, or run around the Rose Bowl. Locals know our hometown celebrities (like Kevin Costner, Orel Hershiser, the “Where’s the beef?” granmmy, Van Halen, Howie Mandell). We eat pesto, drink decaf, don’t think twice about guacamole with our wontons, and like sprouts in our sandwiches. And, if you live on the border of San Marino, there’s a little added pressure because locals from that side of town must own AND wear at least one obnoxiously preppy outfit. I love Pasadena.

A hornet’s nest of debate was recently stirred up nation-wide as men and women pontificated on the meanings and nuances of Callie Kouri’s riveting film “Thelma and Louise.” Was this five-star movie “degrading to men, with pathetic stereotypes of testosterone-crazed behavior” as the New York Daily News insisted, or does it have to do with “responsibility, equality, sensitivity, understanding...” as the Los Angeles Times film critic Sheila Benson put it? Either way, the $20 million earned in the first month of release certainly beckoned the critics to sit up and take notice.

Thelma is married to a dominating chauvinist whose “manliness” is derived from degrading his house-bound wife. Louise, her street-wise friend has had it with her own wandering, non-committal guy who keeps putting marriage off. The two women escape for the weekend, unaware that their spontaneous rendezvous would lead to personal and symbolic possibilities beyond what they would have ever imagined.

After stopping for a drink at a country-western bar, the local washer tries to rape Thelma in the parking lot, only to find the barrel of a gun at his head. Louise saves Thelma from the violent intrusion, then she pulls the trigger on the misogynist, leaving him dead. The two screech out of the parking lot in the T-Bird convertible, launching the beginning of their run from a victim-blaming society as well as an inner journey toward freedom.

Undoubtedly, Thelma and Louise, better than any recent film, shows how women suffer at the hands of a society whose rules and regulations are defined by men giving men privilege and license to incur violence against women, but shrieks in horror should a woman dare to take a stand and protect herself. Interestingly enough, in the film “Total Recall,” Schwarzeneggar shoots a woman in the head and blandly states, “consider that a divorce.” Many in the mainstream found this comical, while few, if any, spent sleepless nights tribulating over how the media is primarily male-identified. While insecure boys whine and complain that this is a male-bashing’ movie, it is noticeable that each lawbreaking move these women make is provoked by men. Quite frankly, the violence in Thelma and Louise pales by comparison to the violence done to women in our society on a day-to-day basis, whether physically, emotionally, economically or socially. Without a doubt, this film challenges the status quo and causes one to think about issues concerning inter-personal relationships and self-identity.

If you didn’t catch “Thelma and Louise” at the theatre, don’t worry. You’ll be able to rent it at the video shop, come January 6, 1992.

The psyche of the male and female sexuality has been tortured almost beyond endurance by the marathon Senate hearings focusing on sexual harassment which mercifully and inconclusively ended the past week. Men will never be able to understand women, we were led to believe, and women who conceal offensive behavior from a male in the workplace for the sake of employment are doing what is typical of most women. I don’t want to believe either of these conclusions, but the painful truth is that human sexuality defines as well as disturbs our deepest personal and social relationships.

No one can betray us unless love and trust has been given and received. The hurt caused by a friend goes deeper than the most vicious attack by a stranger. But deeper yet, is the humiliation and pain caused by the violation of the most sensitive and spiritually vulnerable core of our personhood, our sexual psyche. In the story of creation the divine image is directly linked to the differentiation of human sexuality: So God created humankind in his image, in the image of God he created them; male and female he created them (Gen 1:27) In the second creation account, the solitary earth creature (Adam) is incomplete, and only experiences the joy of being male as determined by encounter and relation with the female (Gen 2:18-23). From this one might conclude, as I do, that the personal and spiritual core of our being as bearing the divine image is intrinsically bound to the experience and expression of the self as male or female, male and female.

The issue of sexual harassment, according to some, is not about sex, but about power. Because males ordinarily are in a power up position in the workplace, females are dependent upon males for their own position and advancement. If power has no intrinsic gender orientation (and I believe it does not), then the solution to the so-called gender gap would seem to be equal power distribution, with the rights of those without power upheld by the law and recourse in the case of harassment.

It is precisely this kind of thinking, I suggest, that has led to the cynicism lying behind the statements in the first paragraph, and the stretching of the gender gap to the point where both males and females are afraid to “reach out and touch.” Uncertainty about one’s own actions when viewed by the other sex, and distrust of the sexuality of others is a logical and tragic consequence of viewing sexual harassment as only a power-conflict. One thing has become clear to all of us, the opposite sex is the opposing sex!

Human sexuality is more than sexual behavior and sexually oriented communication. Sexuality is more than an instinct or impulse rooted in biology. It is an indicator and expression of the core of the self as a personal and spiritual being, open to God and to other persons. The gender gap, with all of its terrible possibilities of intimidation and abuse can only be healed when the psyche of males is trusted and affirmed by females and the psyche of females affirmed and trusted by males. When men and women meet, whether in the workplace, the family, or in the church, power distribution must be subordinate to sexual differentiation and complementarity as the only way of humanizing human relationships. One does not have to be a Christian to know that this is true. Being Christian in making it true for the other person.

Healing The Gender Gap—Reach Out And Touch

by Ray S. Anderson, Professor of Theology and Integration.
A NITA HILL ALLEGED THAT ABOUT TEN years ago, Clarence Thomas said some things to her which were unpleasant and unwelcome, including persistently asking her for dates, making references to his sexual skills, and discussing pornographic materials. As we know, he categorically denied any such conversations ever took place.

If Hill was telling the truth, and the conversations did take place, Thomas would have betrayed the integrity of their professional relationship by using his position to speak with impunity. At the time, for fear of reprisals, she did not make an issue of the events; she was able to tolerate the sporadic episodes (which later ended) within a relationship which remained cordial. Ten years later, during the FBI investigation of Thomas, Hill revealed that something happened, though she didn’t want to go public. The only reason we know anything is that some unethical slimeball leaked the FBI information to the press.

Due to the leak, the country now knows that Hill betrayed something as well. The day before the story broke, Thomas would have assumed (however wrongly) that his relationship with her was trustworthy. The cordiality of her contact since the event contributed to his belief of this. Hill then betrayed that trust by revealing what happened. He was floored by her unexpected accusation.

Again, assuming Hill’s truthfulness, Thomas betrayed her ten years ago, and she betrayed him several weeks ago. The Senate committee, in its quest for “The Truth” only wanted to know whether the event took place. Without blaming the victim, how else could Hill have handled this? What if, when the FBI contacted her, she had drawn upon her Christian upbringing and used Matthew 19 and contacted Thomas (now that she is less vulnerable to reprisals), giving him the opportunity to confront the situation. Then, even if the story had still been leaked, there would have been a place to deal with a ten year old failure.

But later, without the integrity of the relationship intact, there was no way to deal with the charge. She was violated some time ago, and had the advantage of time to deal with what happened. He had nothing but the moral outrage of his violation by her. So of course he could not admit to anything he might have said ten years ago: no one was looking out for his integrity but him. The Senate committee would not protect him; Hill did not “protect” him; so he had to use every ounce of his strength to protect himself.

If Hill and Thomas had simply faced each other in private and then issued a joint statement, that would have been best. In their meeting, the deeper truth of betrayal would have come out, rather than the narrowness of simply whether the events took place. What happened, we will likely never know. In a sense, we shouldn’t have ever known because, ideally, it would have been addressed ten years ago, privately, not in a televised public hearing. As Jesus might have said to Anita, “If a brother sins against you, go to him...
